FAR EASTERN TIME FUSE

The Japanese Peace Treaty:

What it says and what it really means

OF late years little has happened in the world that is as important as the victory of the Chinese revolution. A quarter of humanity has stood up at last on its own feet, has shaken off the fetters of the past, has joined all those peoples in many countries who are ardently searching for a better future.

Those in the Labour Movement know that this is true, and know it with deep and unshakeable conviction. Most Liberals know it. Some Conservatives know it.

And yet the British people do not enjoy close and friendly relations with the New China. This is not because we, as a people, do not desire such relations. Nor is it because the Chinese revolution was led by the Chinese Communists. On the contrary, we recognise that the Chinese have the right to make their revolution in their own way; and we recognise that the Chinese revolution was necessary to Chinese progress. We are not Communists, and we reject many Communist ideas and methods; but that does not prevent us from wanting close and friendly relations with the New China. We are on the side of China's revolution.

What prevents us from having close and friendly relations with the New China? The UDC, which has closely followed events in the Far East during the past few years, believes that it is urgent to know the answer to this vital question.

Friendship with the New China

Does the fault lie with the Chinese? So the Conservatives tell us.

But the Chinese deny this. Mao Tse Tung, the leader of the Chinese Communist party and the leader of the Chinese revolution, has the reputation for saying what he thinks. Even Chiang Kai Shek admits that. "We will be willing", declared Mao Tse Tung on a solemn public occasion in 1949, "on the basis of the principles of equality, mutual benefit and mutual respect for territorial sovereignty, to negotiate the question of the establishment of diplomatic relations with any foreign government, provided that it is willing to sever

WHO WANTS PEACE?

by

BASIL DAVIDSON

At last the statesmen meet at the Summit. But there is one discordant voice—that of Western Germany's Dr. Adenauer. This important pamphlet examines the reasons why—and shows why Britain now has a vital and decisive part to play in winning peace and disarmament in Europe.
